Educational Training Description:

The common occurrence of supervisory relationships that have elements of friendship within them is explored. Supervisors become friendly with supervisees or co-workers are promoted into supervisory roles, often with resulting complications and benefits. Ways in which guidelines warning against dual relationships inform decisions about friendship within supervision are discussed.

Speaker: *Mark S. Carlson, PhD, LP, Assistant Professor
Argosy University—Twin Cities*

Learning Objectives:

- Identify three ways that the presence of friendship in supervision can complicate the supervisory process.
- Determine if friendship within supervision constitutes a dual relationship sufficiently serious to suggest a problem exists.
- List three precautions to reduce the chance that friendly relations within supervision will become problematic.
